WASHINGTON

The White House Wedding Is Food for Unlimited Surmise.

Washington, Oct. 18.—Mrs. Wilson and the Misses Wilson have rejoined the President at the White House, so Washington society looks upon the "little season," as being formally opened. The Vice-President and Mrs. Marshall were here to greet Mrs. Wilson, as were Mrs. Bryan and the other women of the Cabinet, and immediately after her arrival there ensued the usual stream of callers, official and unofficial, trundling up to the White House door in electric, horse and horseless carriages and what not, just to leave a card. Of course, every card is recorded on the great White House social register and is understood to be accompanied by a little prayer for an invitation to the approaching wedding.

The opening of the first season of an administration is always of particular interest to official and resident society in Washington, but to open right on the eve of a White House wedding—why, then it is of interest to the whole United States and to much of the world which lies beyond.

So much secrecy, intended or otherwise, surrounds the details for the marriage of Miss Jessie Wilson and Francis B. Sayre that it but whets curiosity and leads to a thousand little intrigues to secure a few details to which society would not otherwise resort. Every trunk, box or package which arrived with the White House luggage on Thursday was viewed with excitement, with a hope of discovering a white ribbon or some sign of wedding finery. But, aside from the fact that the bride has chosen white satin of unusual softness and richness to be made into a draped wedding gown, no one knows a thing.

For weeks before leaving Harlakenden, sewing was in progress and much of the simpler part of the trousseau is now packed away in lavender to await the call of the bride. Days were spent in making up a list of the necessities in the way of shoes, hosiery, lingerie and the thousand and one small things which go toward making the wedding chest of a bride, be she from the White House or just the daughter of a simple democratic voter, and these things have been the object of the many shopping expeditions to New York.

All of the little details connected with the marriage of Princess Alexandra, Duchess of Fife, and Prince Arthur of Connaught, which took place in the Royal Chapel, St. James's Palace, London, on Wednesday (from the description of the bride's gown of white chamoise, embroidered in pearls and diamonds, to the wedding gifts, which will be placed on public exhibition at St. James's Palace next week), have been of keenest interest. Of course, one could not imagine such regal splendor surrounding the marriage of the daughter of the President of a young republic, and likewise they could not imagine Miss Jessie Wilson's wedding gifts being placed on exhibition, say, in the East Room of the White House, at a shilling a head to the curious, the proceeds to go to the victims of some mine
